Why Chose an Academic Health System for Your Care

- Cooper is a teaching hospital and educates the next generation of physicians, conducts cutting-edge research that saves lives, and cares for the sickest and region's most medically complex patients.
- Studies show that patients treated at teaching hospitals have up to 20% better odds of survival than those treated elsewhere. That's not just for complex care but also for the most common medical and surgical conditions.
- Cooper has contributed to important breakthroughs in medicine and patient care.
- Cooper has been a critical part of the region's crisis response network—providing support in emergencies, from hurricanes to the Ebola crisis to the Coronavirus Pandemic.
- Although Cooper and other teaching hospitals represent only 5% of the nation's hospitals, major teaching hospitals make an outsized contribution to U.S. health care—especially because the doctors they train go on to advance care wherever they practice.
- Whether it's educating the next generation of health care professionals, pioneering medical discoveries, or providing high-quality patient care, Cooper University Health Care plays a vital role in improving health care and the health of the region.
